The ownership of some season almost camp in the mountains has become almost camp in the mountains has become almost a necessity on the part of many towns people. And when all is considered it means a vast expenditure of money, as well; since we inlanders have to go so far for our pleasure and our requisite change of air. With Chicagons it is different. They live on a igke, anyway, and their summer places at Occonomowoc and Lake Geneva are only a stone's throw from home.

There are exceptions of course, but in the main they flit about from Course, but in the main they mit about from Bar Harbor to Warm Springs and cross the Atlantic continually. When a St. Louis family decides to build or buy a cottage at Magnolia, you will seldom find them leaving it, summer after summer.

The question of leaving town for the man of modest means and moderate family is in the put a toke, but a prefix serious prop-no wise a joke, but a pretty serious propsition. I know one man who earns a very comfortable amount of money each year. He has three small children and every summer comes the same old controversy as to where they shall go and what they shall do. Leaving town is out of the question for papa, and every season that I have known him he cheerfully enters into the plans and helps select some place that they will like. Then, most important of all, he foots the bills. "My family are not any too pleased about it, but I'm going to keep them at home this year," he told me the other day. "The worm has turned. I've been left alone from every June until October just about long enough, and I'm tired of it. This plea of needing a change is right enough if my family are ill, but when my children skip about as lively as you please, and my wife never was better in her life, there isn't a peg of excuse to hang on. As for my conditop when left alone, it is something awful Every year until last I've lived at restaurants and slept in a gloomy, shut-up house and haunted the summer gardens at night for a little recreation. Last summer I thought out another scheme; and decided to hire one of our old cooks, who had married; and get her and her husband to comand take charge of the house, keep it open, supply my meals, and make things gen-erally comfortable. This was all right. Everything went well and I was decidedly entented until the first month's bills cam in. Gee Whiz! The cook had boarded all her relatives at my house, apparently; for that one month's accounts were away above the usual amount that it takes to run my entire family when at home; and you see I had my wife's bills up North to pay as well. I stood it for three months, cause there was nothing else to do; but this summer I positively cannot afford two
